Morrison Carnegie, Henry G. Trevor Jr., John J. Emery, Remond L. Brooks, Wyllys Bette Jr., Stuart Bowers and Kenneth O'Brien.

Mrs. George Jay Gould gave a dance last night for her daughter, Miss Gloria Gould, who is not yet out. It took place at her house, 877 Fifth Avenue. The guests numbered between fifty and sixty, and were boys and girls home from school and college.

The first of the metropolitan dances for this season took place last night in the ballroom of the Ritz-Carlton. The committee this year includes Mrs. H. C. Casimir de Rham, Mrs. J. Archibald Murray, Mrs. Robert L. Stevens, Mrs. Goodhue Livingston and Mrs. J. P. Morgan.

"A NEW TOLSTOI"

By J. Wasserman

"Before such a work of art comment seems indecent, at best inadequate. I recall no novel of such ambitious intent since 'Jean-Christophe' and beside Wassermann, Rolland appears as a mere child lecturer."—Llewellyn Jones in Chicago Evening Post.

Opera Conductor Protested After Hearing Walska Sing

Marinuzzi, in Terse Phrases, Said It Would Be Impossible to Produce "Zaza" With Much Heralded Diva in Leading Role

Special Dispatch to The Tribune

CHICAGO, Dec. 29.—At last—an explanation. It was a smiling, kindly world of opera stars, managers and patrons that greeted Mme. Ganna Walska, widely acclaimed diva, and, through her husband, Alexander Smith Cochran, the world's richest song bird, when she arrived in Chicago just five weeks ago. Congratulations were showered upon her.

Sharply contrasted was her departure. Accompanied only by her maid, she slipped away. The constellations had ordained that Walska should not sing in public here this season, at least.

When the high notes first cleared the throat of the much press-agented soprano and issued full upon the auditorium, where Director Marinuzzi and his assistants were holding their first rehearsal of "Zaza" it was a tense moment. Artists roused themselves from their little-tattle in the wings to hear the "great one" sing.

A great silence pervaded the house, as the clear soprano tones crashed against the emptiness and the emptiness remained.

Marinuzzi gave his baton an imperious command and the orchestra stopped.

"Again," he ordered, and again the diva's high soprano trilled out the opening solo of "Zaza."

Once more Marinuzzi gave his baton the quick, nervous command. "We will try again," the gallant conductor ordered, bestowing a kindly look upon the singer on the stage.

For one minute—two minutes—three minutes she sang. The strains from her throat filled the theater. She was reaching the climax of her first solo without warning—Titta Rufu walked from the stage.

Marinuzzi interrupted, tapping his baton sharply on the wooden ledge behind him. The musicians put down their instruments.

"That is all to-day," the great conductor ordered. "To-morrow at 11." Then, turning to Mme. Walska, he bowed profoundly and added: "Thank you."

A stillness settled over the great auditorium as Marinuzzi, bowing himself out, disappeared into the office of Business Manager Johnson.

There he conferred with Marinuzzi, usually confined to the dreamy music his efforts produce, was unleashed in a volley of terse, cryptic phrases. He explained to Mr. Johnson in terms that would have done justice to the Italian representatives at the peace conference, the impossibility of his directing the daring, the stupendous "Zaza" with Mme. Walska in the leading role.

Johnson's diplomacy then was called into play to carry the message to Mme. Walska. In his politest way he translated Marinuzzi's verdict on her voice to the singer herself. Mr. Johnson conveyed to Mme. Walska Marinuzzi's compliments on her dazzling beauty. Then he delivered the ultimatum on her voice and fled. Madam's flight to New York followed.

It was the diva's beauty that attracted the attention of Harold F. McCormick, chief sponsor of the opera company, who heard her sing in Havana and recommended her engagement, with the proviso that Marinuzzi should pass verdict on her voice.

Every effort to reach Mme. Walska after she arrived at the Olympic was in vain. No interview or explanation could be obtained after the couple entered their suite of state rooms on C deck.

In answer to all requests, the same stereotyped answer was given through the closed door of the suite. "We do not wish to be disturbed. We have nothing to say. Kindly leave us alone."

Among the other 600 first cabin passengers was W. L. George, English novelist, feminist and lecturer, who returned to England after a visit of brief in his country. His observations here can be summed up in a few words: "America is a land of achievement—Europe is a land of enjoyment."

Commander Emanuel V. Parodi, president of the Federation of Italian Steamship Lines; Robert Walton Goetz, colonel and Mrs. Henry H. Rogers, accompanied by their daughter, Miss Dyer Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Pierpont Hamilton, were among the others who sailed on the Olympic.

Walska and Husband Silently Sail Away

"We Have Nothing to Say, Leave Us Alone," Farewell Through the Door on the Olympic

Alexander Smith Cochran, termed before his marriage, "America's richest bachelor," and his bride, Mme. Ganna Walska, the Polish prima donna, sailed yesterday on the White Star liner Olympic to spend the winter on the Continent. The couple maintained the strict silence which began with Mme. Walska's arrival in New York on December 21.
